

February 24th, 1936

My dear Huxley,

I have written a draft account of what I have done, which I am sending you at once for your guidance. For my part, before publication I want to check a mass of calculations, and ever since I have not had time to do all my own arithmetic I have found that this job of checking is likely to drag interminably. I do not expect it to alter the general result, though it may well affect individual cases. _____

Yours sincerely,