First-time expectant fathers’ experiences and expectations of the perinatal period

Tiffany De Sousa Machado

This thesis is submitted in partial fulfilment of the Honours degree of Bachelor of Psychology

School of Psychology
University of Adelaide
October 2016

Word Count: 11,636
Table of Contents

Abstract ................................................................................................................................. v

Presentations based on the data from this thesis................................................................. vi

Declaration................................................................................................................................ vii

Acknowledgements................................................................................................................. viii

CHAPTER 1 - Introduction ........................................................................................................ 1

1.1 The Perinatal Period ......................................................................................................... 1

1.1.1 Postnatal Depression .................................................................................................. 3

1.1.2 Implications of Postnatal Depression ......................................................................... 4

1.1.3 Barriers to Help Seeking ............................................................................................. 5

1.1.4 Paternal Postnatal Depression .................................................................................... 6

1.1.5 Culturally Bound? ....................................................................................................... 6

1.1.6 Cultural Context ......................................................................................................... 7

1.2 Men’s Role in the Perinatal Period .................................................................................... 8

1.3 Role Theory ..................................................................................................................... 10

1.4 Illness Perception and Explanatory Models and the Biopsychosocial Perspective. 11

1.5 Aims and Research Question ........................................................................................... 12

CHAPTER 2 – Method ............................................................................................................. 13

2.1 Participants ....................................................................................................................... 13

2.2 Procedure ......................................................................................................................... 13

CHAPTER 3 – Results ............................................................................................................. 18

3.1 Participant Characteristics ............................................................................................... 18

3.2 Overview .......................................................................................................................... 19

3.3 Experiences of the Antenatal Period ................................................................................. 21
3.3.1 Preparing for a newborn ................................................................. 21

3.3.1.1 Hard work and No Fun.......................................................... 21

3.3.1.2 Lack or Preparation for the Postnatal Period .................. 21

3.3.1.3 Nesting .................................................................................. 22

3.4 Expectations of the Postnatal Period ........................................... 23

3.4.1 Illness Perception Models of Postnatal Depression .................. 23

3.4.1.1 Identification.......................................................... 23

3.4.1.2 Aetiology.............................................................. 24

3.4.1.3 Perceived Control .................................................. 24

3.4.1.4 Treatment ............................................................... 25

3.4.1.5 Reactions .............................................................. 26

3.4.1.6 Severity .......................................................................... 27

3.4.2 Gendered Roles and Power ....................................................... 27

3.4.2.1 Minimising the Woman .............................................. 28

3.4.2.2 PND: Is it a Thing? .................................................. 29

3.4.2.3 Men Seeking Help as a Last Resort .............................. 30

3.4.2.4 Pregnancy as Accomplishment .................................. 31

3.4.3 Idealistic Postnatal Expectations ............................................ 31

3.4.3.1 What Men Want ...................................................... 33

3.4.4 The Risk of Postnatal Depression to Men ............................. 33

3.4.4.1 Personal Fears .......................................................... 34

3.4.4.2 Providing ............................................................. 35

3.4.4.3 Men no Longer First .................................................. 35

3.4.4.4 Multitasking .......................................................... 36

CHAPTER 4 – Discussion ...................................................................... 38
Abstract

Postnatal depression (PND) affects approximately 16% of women in Australia. PND can have damaging and lasting effects on women, their infants and the family, including the risk of paternal PND (PPND). There is limited research on men’s perceptions of and understanding about PND, despite the fact they may play an important role in identifying symptoms and encouraging their partner to seek help. Furthermore, they may also require emotional, psychological and practical support during the perinatal period. The current understanding of PND within a biomedical model includes both psychological and biological elements. In this qualitative study, the knowledge, beliefs and attitudes first-time fathers have of the perinatal period, specifically in relation to PND and their attitudes towards help seeking were explored. As well as covering the psychological and biological aspects of PND, gender roles and men’s expectations and notions of motherhood were discussed by participants. Through triangulating data from both expectant fathers and their partners, Thematic Analysis identified five main themes: Preparing for a Newborn, Illness Perceptions of PND, Gendered Roles and Power, Idealistic Postnatal Expectations, and The Risk of PND to Men. This study provides insight into what first-time fathers know and are prepared for in the postnatal period. These insights have the potential to inform health professionals in educating and preparing first time parents for the reality of life with a newborn, in clinical settings, health promotion campaigns and in health care and government policy.
Presentations based on the data from this thesis

De Sousa Machado, T. (2016, September). First-time expectant fathers’ experiences and expectations of the perinatal period. Presentation at the South Australian Gender & Sexuality Studies Postgraduate Conference, Adelaide, South Australia. (See Appendix I)

DECLARATION:

This thesis contains no material which has been accepted for the award of any other degree or diploma in any University and, to the best of my knowledge, this thesis contains no materials previously published except where due reference is made. I give consent to this copy of my thesis, when deposited in the University Library, being available for loan and photocopying.

Tiffany De Sousa Machado

October, 2016
Acknowledgements

I would like to first and foremost, sincerely thank my supervisor, Professor Anna Chur-Hansen. I could not have asked for a more supportive, attentive and guiding person to help me through this year. I am infinitely grateful for the experience of working with you not just as a supervisor, but as someone I aspire to be like in many ways. Your influence on my learning and on my being has been profound – thank you.

I would like to thank Associate Professor Amanda LeCouteur for her insights into postnatal depression from a social constructionist perspective; I left each seminar with my fire further fuelled to pursue this research now and into the future.

I would like to thank Associate Professor Heather Mattner who provided advice and a professional perspective throughout the writing of this research.

To an amazing cohort of fellow students; it has been such a pleasure working alongside you.

Thank you to my partner James for being so supportive and willing to do whatever it took to help me through this year, despite being almost 3000 kilometres away. Thank you for all the tidying and playing you did with the children, and for your love and encouragement.

Thank you to Craig for being instrumental in my awareness and pursuit of this research and for truly sharing the care of our daughter Faith so that I could focus on the writing of this thesis.

Thank you to John Gazzola - you are a true feminist and advocate of equal rights; your support and guidance this year has been invaluable to me.
My heartfelt thanks to all the participants in my study who gave their time and shared their experiences and feelings with me so that we could add to this important area of research. I wish you all the very best in your parenting journey.

Thank you to my mum and to my daughter Faith. Faith, thank you for understanding all the times I had to study, or was tired from studying and not always up for playing. Thank you for being so patient in the months leading up to the end of the research. Mum, without you in my life I have struggled as a mother; I’ve missed you every day, but in your absence I found a passion within me that I hope can change the lives of women. And of course, thank you both for being in my life; without your beautiful presence, I would never have known how to love the way I do.

Finally, to my nanna, a very big part of my life who sadly passed away in the final weeks of writing this thesis. Thank you for being a constant reminder of the love and dedication it takes to be a mother and a woman.