King's Interest

"Those are qualities which appeal, also, to his Majesty the King. When I had the honor of an interview with him, he commanded me to convey his gratitude to the people of South Australia, and his best wishes for their welfare and prosperity. He spoke to me in terms of very real admiration of those qualities I have mentioned. (Applause.) He told me, also, that he felt confident that the great spirit of determination and courage would carry you through to the success which you desire, and so well deserve.

"He talked with intimate knowledge of affairs out here. You would be surprised if you knew how much he knows of the details connected with your daily life and work. He keeps himself in touch with everything. He admires your efforts, and is full of praise for the way that you are trying to emerge from difficulties toward success. In those efforts you can rely on my help and my support so far as those lie in my power and my province. (Applause.)

"My wife and I have come here as strangers to a strange land, but, on the contrary, we have come to a new home and to our own people. (Applause.) There is a very true saying that home is where the heart is, and our hearts are here in South Australia, beating in sympathy with yours. (Applause.) We are proud and happy to be with you, and anxious to join with you in helping South Australia to maintain the proud position she already holds—a position that is in the van of that great family known as the British Empire." (Applause.)

Government House Levee

The attendance at the levee at Government House, which followed the swearing-in ceremony at the Town Hall, was probably the largest in the history of the State. It was considerably in excess of 800, and was fully representative of the public and social life of the State. Ordinarily, a levee occupies scarcely more than half an hour at the most, but on Saturday it was not concluded within the hour. At times the queue extended to the entrance gates of Government House, and it was continually being added to by new arrivals.

The presence of an unusually large number of representatives of both the naval and military forces in uniform lent additional color to a ceremony which is always picturesque. The Governor, attended by his aides-de-camp in full dress uniform, inspected the guard of honor, which, in brilliant sunshine was drawn up on the lawn in front of Government House, after which he took up his stand on the dais in the ballroom. With his Excellency were the Lieutenant-Governor (Sir George Murray), members of the judiciary, and others.

Following a long-established custom, members of the University Council and Senate, in their academic gowns, walked in a body from the University to Government House along North terrace, and they were among the first to be presented. Many of the visitors were in morning dress, and almost all the representatives of the military forces with war service wore their decorations.

At the conclusion of the levee his Excellency received addresses of welcome and loyalty from the following bodies:—The Synod of the Church of England, the Baptist Union, the Presbyterian Church, the Congregational Union and Home Mission, the Methodist Church, the Salvation Army, the Evangelical Lutheran Synod, the Chamber of Manufacturers, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Justices' Association.

His Excellency replied: "As his Majesty's representative I thank you for your expressions of loyalty and devotion to the Throne and person of his Majesty the King. It will be my pleasure to convey to his Majesty the warm and loyal welcome which I have received on my arrival in the State of South Australia.

"I thank you all for your generous and kind words with which you have welcomed my wife and myself, and your assurance that you will continue in your prayers to assist us in our endeavors to enter into, to the best of our abilities, the religious and commercial advancement of this State. I cordially reciprocate the expressions of your hope that during my term of office prosperity may come to all in South Australia."

Work Of Anthropological Expedition

Cinematograph films and lantern slides of the natives of Central Australia, taken on the Mann and Musgrave Ranges anthropological expedition last year, were shown last night in the anatomical lecture theatre at the Adelaide University. In conjunction with the films, which were shown under the direction of the Board of Anthropological Research, University of Adelaide, a descriptive talk was given by Mr. N. B. Tindale, the ethnologist at the Adelaide Museum.

Mr. Tindale said that the expedition was undertaken in the far north-western part of South Australia. The cold early mornings made the native men quarrel, because they thought that by quarrelling they could get warm. The cold was intense in the Mann Ranges, and often the natives carried firesticks until noon, in order that they might keep warm. One tribe of 150 natives had 200 dogs. The dogs were rarely fed, and had to find their food. Native children spent much of their time hunting for grubs, beetles, snakes, and kurrajong seed.

Professor T. Harvey Johnston, professor of zoology at the University, said that dingo scalps were brought in by the natives to the white man and traded for tea, sugar, and flour.

Dr. T. D. Campbell, secretary of the Board of Anthropological Research, introduced the lecturers.

TRIBUTE TO ADELAIDE MUSICIANS

"GLORIOUS STRING QUARTET," SAYS PERCY GRAINGER

To the Editor
Sir—Australians are remarkably generous to visiting musicians and always seem eager to proclaim how much they owe to their advents. It is obvious, however, that music-lovers in Australia, as elsewhere, owe most to those local organisations that keep the torch of music burning by means of a steady succession of light-shedding performances of the greatest musical masterpieces—for a familiarity with such music lies at the root of all interest and delight in the art.

I can hardly express all the gratitude that I, as a composer and music-lover, feel to Dr. E. Harold Davies and his colleagues for the magnificent organisations they have sponsored and created in Adelaide—the South Australian Orchestra, the Bach Society, the Elder Conservatorium String Quartet, and other valuable bodies.

Adelaide is particularly fortunate in its glorious string quartet. Comparing it with the finest quartets of Europe and America (with which I, as a chamber music composer, have had wide and long association) I have no hesitation in saying that the Elder String Quartet is not only one of the world's most superb quartets, but that, in addition, it possesses a peculiar and original beauty all its own. Its artists have given birth to a luscious and loving blend of tone that is at once intrinsically musical and typically Australian, being comparable, in the domain of string sonority, to the vocal loveliness of Melba.

Many of the world's famed quartets have developed—in striving for meticulous accuracy and unity—a strained harshness of attack, a "militariness" of discipline, that seem foreign to the joy-rooted nature of chamber music. Not so the Elders; with them unity and perfection are effortless, or sound so, at any rate. Many great quartets are so highly specialised as to cover only a narrow range of music. The Elder players know no such limitations, and they are as much at home in the polyphony of Josquin des Prez (1450-1521), in the English "Fancies" of the 16th and 17th centuries, in the contemporary tone-dreams of Herman Sandby, as they are in the late quartets of Beethoven, several of which latter they are at present presenting to Adelaide audiences for the first time. I repeat; our debt to such an organisation is incalculable.—I am, Sir, &c.,
PERCY GRAINGER,
