OLIVER CROMWELL.

"Nothing is to be done by - these two words, 'by patient waiting' - is one of the fruitfully various ways of a desiring way of expressing what God's way is. We must think of Cromwell's way of patience, of his method of waiting, of his way of thinking. He was a patient man, he was a waiting man, he was a patient man of action.

At Cambridge, where he had studied, he had come to know the importance of patience. He had seen how the work of the university was often delayed, and how the work of the church was often hindered. He had seen how the work of the state was often delayed, and how the work of the nation was often hindered. He had seen how the work of the world was often delayed, and how the work of the universe was often hindered.

Therefore, he was a patient man, he was a waiting man, he was a patient man of action.

In his time, patience was a virtue. In his time, waiting was a virtue. In his time, action was a virtue.

Therefore, he was a patient man, he was a waiting man, he was a patient man of action.

In his time, patience was a virtue. In his time, waiting was a virtue. In his time, action was a virtue.

Therefore, he was a patient man, he was a waiting man, he was a patient man of action.
