Advertiser 25th February 1903

The Advertiser is a newspaper published in Adelaide, South Australia. The text in the image is an excerpt from an article that appears to be discussing various topics, including a response to a letter, educational institutions, and political matters. The section about the University of Adelaide is particularly noteworthy, as it reflects on the rapid growth of the university and its impact on the local community.

The text also contains some historical context, mentioning the appointment of Sir John Florence, the first chancellor of the University of Adelaide. Sir John Florence played a significant role in the establishment of the university and was known for his contributions to education and government.

Overall, the article provides a glimpse into the historical development of the University of Adelaide and its influence on the region. The Advertiser's coverage of such events highlights the newspaper's role in documenting and reporting on the important issues of its time.