Unbridled Gap

There has always existed between our Universities in Australia and our primary education system an unbridled gap. The gap is much greater now than in the past, due to a number of factors. The most significant is the rapid increase in the number of students, especially in the newer states, and the consequent overcrowding of schools. As a result, many children are not graduating from primary school with the same skills and knowledge as those who are. This has led to a lack of preparation for higher education, which is essential for success in university.
