To the Editor,

Sir—I notice in the Director's report to the University Council, in the number of the "Advertiser" on May 24, a few sentences of importance which I should like to touch. He says—

"The chief objection which many students seem to be that they are not permitted or encouraged to go to the lectures and to attend the courses of study leading to a University degree." I must say that I think the students fully realise the necessity of this. The work that they do is of the highest importance to the success of their education. It is of the highest importance that they should attend the lectures, and that every student should be present at every lecture. The course of study is designed for the student's benefit and advantage. It is of the highest importance that they should be present at every lecture in the course of study, so as to benefit by it, and to acquire the necessary knowledge. The course of study is designed for the student's benefit and advantage. It is of the highest importance that they should be present at every lecture in the course of study, so as to benefit by it, and to acquire the necessary knowledge. The course of study is designed for the student's benefit and advantage. It is of the highest importance that they should be present at every lecture in the course of study, so as to benefit by it, and to acquire the necessary knowledge.

Sincerely yours,

[Signature]

[Name]

---

Sir—We are not in the habit of criticizing the work of the University, but we feel that the information contained in the report of the Director is of such importance that we feel bound to express our views on it. The Director states that the students are not permitted or encouraged to go to the lectures and to attend the courses of study leading to a University degree. This is not correct. The students are fully aware of the importance of attending the lectures and attending the courses of study leading to a University degree. They realise that the work they do is of the highest importance to their education, and that every student should be present at every lecture in the course of study. They also realise that the course of study is designed for their benefit and advantage, and that every student should be present at every lecture in the course of study so as to benefit by it and acquire the necessary knowledge. The course of study is designed for their benefit and advantage, and every student should be present at every lecture in the course of study so as to benefit by it and acquire the necessary knowledge.

Sincerely yours,

[Signature]

[Name]

---

Sir—The Director's report to the University Council, in the number of the "Advertiser" on May 24, contains a statement which I feel bound to criticize. He states—

"The chief objection which many students seem to be that they are not permitted or encouraged to go to the lectures and to attend the courses of study leading to a University degree." I must say that I think the students fully realise the necessity of this. The work that they do is of the highest importance to the success of their education. It is of the highest importance that they should attend the lectures, and that every student should be present at every lecture. The course of study is designed for the student's benefit and advantage. It is of the highest importance that they should be present at every lecture in the course of study, so as to benefit by it, and to acquire the necessary knowledge. The course of study is designed for the student's benefit and advantage. It is of the highest importance that they should be present at every lecture in the course of study, so as to benefit by it, and to acquire the necessary knowledge.