Professor Stirling's Speech.

Professor Stirling, who was cordially received by all, said his subject was to expect the Government of Queensland, on behalf of the University of Adelaide, its very best wishes in the tribute of congratulation, and he extended to it, without reservation, the congratulations that should be accorded to any University that had been established under its care, and which had been duly founded in the interests of education. In his opinion, Queensland was as worthy of this honour as any other State, and he wished the University of Queensland a success that would be the envy of other institutions. The University of Queensland had been established by the people of the colony, and he hoped that the University of Queensland would be as successful as the University of Adelaide.

Planting a Tree.

At the invitation of the and as a further demonstration of the importance of the work of the University, the Governor of the University, Lord Brougham, and the Premier of the Colony, was present at the laying of the foundation stone of the University College, which was to be the first University College to be erected in Queensland. The Governor was to lay the foundation stone, and the Premier was to address the students and the public.

CONCLUDING PROCEEDINGS.
