ANATOMY LICENCES CANCELLED.

In Executive Council, on Wednesday, morning licences granted to 29 persons to practise anatomy were cancelled. The licence Act provides for licences to be issued to persons to practise anatomy at the school of anatomy at the University. In 1893 a large number of licences were granted to students in the medical school. It has been ascertained that this was not necessary, as the students were not practising anatomy within the meaning of the Act. Licences were not issued before or since, and it is the Secretary or demonstrator who practises it. For this reason the licences granted to the students in 1893 have been cancelled.

THE MOST FAMOUS TRAGEDY.

"THESPiEALS OF THE ELDID." From the Reserve, MA.

Will you allow me to give expression to what I am sure is the feeling of the hundreds of citizens who have had this pleasure of listening to the course of masterly studies of Hamlet and the Shakespearean drama? Professor Henderson has just delivered. Professor Henderson and the University have made the State their debtors by putting within the reach of the humblest citizen such high ethical teaching—the fruit of the great talents and wide knowledge which the extension lectures bring to the service of all who care to give the time and pay the nominal charge for admission to those splendid addresses. Professor Henderson must have more resonance with the large audiences that gathered to hear him, but also by the inquisitive, interested, the quick response to his words which were so marked through his course of lectures. I am sure the effect of his addresses—so lofty in conception, so clear in thought, so admirable in method of delivery—will be far-reaching and long-enduring. As a father to whom God has given a number of sons, as a man whose profession stands for the elevation as well as the redemption of men, and as one whose life is but the service of his fellows, I rejoice greatly that the highest seat of learning in Australia has been visited by such distinguished abilities, such weight of character, and such readiness to give all splendid powers at the service of the community. Great as the influence of the University of Adelaide is, the influence of these Extension lectures show what a mighty factor it may become. As a father of this University and as a parent of Extension lectures, it is my great joy to welcome to the extensive community. To the many thousands of young men who have had to leave school early, and who have not had the educational advantages which have fallen to the lot of some others—and to the young women, too, for that matter—who have toiled and weeded, it is my joy. For the while the most scholarly can receive pleasure and profit from these Lectures, they will, as well as advantage for all.

EXTENSION LECTURES.

On Tuesday, July 8, at the University, Professor Jethro Brown will deliver the first of a course of three lectures on "The University and Modern Legislation." The particular subject of Thursday's lecture will be "The Ideal of Modern Democracy." Further particulars will be found in our advertising columns.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION LECTURES.

To the Editor,

Sir—Will you allow me to give expression to what I am sure is the feeling of the hundreds of citizens who have had the pleasure of listening to the course of masterly studies of Hamlet and the Shakespearean drama? Professor Henderson has just delivered. Professor Henderson and the University have made the State their debtors by putting within the reach of the humblest citizen such high ethical teaching—the fruit of the great talents and wide knowledge which the extension lectures bring to the service of all who care to give the time and pay the nominal charge for admission to those splendid addresses. Professor Henderson must have more resonance with the large audiences that gathered to hear him, but also by the inquisitive, interested, the quick response to his words which were so marked through his course of lectures. I am sure the effect of his addresses—so lofty in conception, so clear in thought, so admirable in method of delivery—will be far-reaching and long-enduring. As a father to whom God has given a number of sons, as a man whose profession stands for the elevation as well as the redemption of men, and as one whose life is but the service of his fellows, I rejoice greatly that the highest seat of learning in Australia has been visited by such distinguished abilities, such weight of character, and such readiness to give all splendid powers at the service of the community. Great as the influence of the University of Adelaide is, the influence of these Extension lectures show what a mighty factor it may become. As a father of this University and as a parent of Extension lectures, it is my great joy to welcome to the extensive community. To the many thousands of young men who have had to leave school early, and who have not had the educational advantages which have fallen to the lot of some others—and to the young women, too, for that matter—who have toiled and weeded, it is my joy. For the while the most scholarly can receive pleasure and profit from these Lectures, they will, as well as advantage for all.

JOSEPH ROBERTSON.

(The Vestry, Clayton Church.)

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION LECTURES.

To the Editor,

Sir—Will you allow me to give expression to what I am sure is the feeling of the hundreds of citizens who have had the pleasure of listening to the course of masterly studies of Hamlet and the Shakespearean drama? Professor Henderson has just delivered. Professor Henderson and the University have made the State their debtors by putting within the reach of the humblest citizen such high ethical teaching—the fruit of the great talents and wide knowledge which the extension lectures bring to the service of all who care to give the time and pay the nominal charge for admission to those splendid addresses. Professor Henderson must have more resonance with the large audiences that gathered to hear him, but also by the inquisitive, interested, the quick response to his words which were so marked through his course of lectures. I am sure the effect of his addresses—so lofty in conception, so clear in thought, so admirable in method of delivery—will be far-reaching and long-enduring. As a father to whom God has given a number of sons, as a man whose profession stands for the elevation as well as the redemption of men, and as one whose life is but the service of his fellows, I rejoice greatly that the highest seat of learning in Australia has been visited by such distinguished abilities, such weight of character, and such readiness to give all splendid powers at the service of the community. Great as the influence of the University of Adelaide is, the influence of these Extension lectures show what a mighty factor it may become. As a father of this University and as a parent of Extension lectures, it is my great joy to welcome to the extensive community. To the many thousands of young men who have had to leave school early, and who have not had the educational advantages which have fallen to the lot of some others—and to the young women, too, for that matter—who have toiled and weeded, it is my joy. For the while the most scholarly can receive pleasure and profit from these Lectures, they will, as well as advantage for all.

JOSEPH ROBERTSON.

(The Vestry, Clayton Church.)

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION LECTURES.

To the Editor,

Sir—Will you allow me to give expression to what I am sure is the feeling of the hundreds of citizens who have had the pleasure of listening to the course of masterly studies of Hamlet and the Shakespearean drama? Professor Henderson has just delivered. Professor Henderson and the University have made the State their debtors by putting within the reach of the humblest citizen such high ethical teaching—the fruit of the great talents and wide knowledge which the extension lectures bring to the service of all who care to give the time and pay the nominal charge for admission to those splendid addresses. Professor Henderson must have more resonance with the large audiences that gathered to hear him, but also by the inquisitive, interested, the quick response to his words which were so marked through his course of lectures. I am sure the effect of his addresses—so lofty in conception, so clear in thought, so admirable in method of delivery—will be far-reaching and long-enduring. As a father to whom God has given a number of sons, as a man whose profession stands for the elevation as well as the redemption of men, and as one whose life is but the service of his fellows, I rejoice greatly that the highest seat of learning in Australia has been visited by such distinguished abilities, such weight of character, and such readiness to give all splendid powers at the service of the community. Great as the influence of the University of Adelaide is, the influence of these Extension lectures show what a mighty factor it may become. As a father of this University and as a parent of Extension lectures, it is my great joy to welcome to the extensive community. To the many thousands of young men who have had to leave school early, and who have not had the educational advantages which have fallen to the lot of some others—and to the young women, too, for that matter—who have toiled and weeded, it is my joy. For the while the most scholarly can receive pleasure and profit from these Lectures, they will, as well as advantage for all.

JOSEPH ROBERTSON.

(The Vestry, Clayton Church.)

THE ANATOMY ACT.

The Executive Council on Wednesday passed an order to cancel the licences granted to lectures in the medical school. The Anatomy Act provides for licences to be issued by the University to students in the school of anatomy at the University. In 1903 a large number of licences were granted to students in the medical school. It has been ascertained that this was not necessary, as the students were not practising anatomy within the meaning of the Act. Licences were not issued before or since, and it is the Secretary or demonstrator who practises it. For this reason the licences granted to the students in 1903 have been cancelled.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION LECTURES.

To the Editor,

Sir—Will you allow me to give expression to what I am sure is the feeling of the hundreds of citizens who have had the pleasure of listening to the course of masterly studies of Hamlet and the Shakespearean drama? Professor Henderson has just delivered. Professor Henderson and the University have made the State their debtors by putting within the reach of the humblest citizen such high ethical teaching—the fruit of the great talents and wide knowledge which the extension lectures bring to the service of all who care to give the time and pay the nominal charge for admission to those splendid addresses. Professor Henderson must have more resonance with the large audiences that gathered to hear him, but also by the inquisitive, interested, the quick response to his words which were so marked through his course of lectures. I am sure the effect of his addresses—so lofty in conception, so clear in thought, so admirable in method of delivery—will be far-reaching and long-enduring. As a father to whom God has given a number of sons, as a man whose profession stands for the elevation as well as the redemption of men, and as one whose life is but the service of his fellows, I rejoice greatly that the highest seat of learning in Australia has been visited by such distinguished abilities, such weight of character, and such readiness to give all splendid powers at the service of the community. Great as the influence of the University of Adelaide is, the influence of these Extension lectures show what a mighty factor it may become. As a father of this University and as a parent of Extension lectures, it is my great joy to welcome to the extensive community. To the many thousands of young men who have had to leave school early, and who have not had the educational advantages which have fallen to the lot of some others—and to the young women, too, for that matter—who have toiled and weeded, it is my joy. For the while the most scholarly can receive pleasure and profit from these Lectures, they will, as well as advantage for all.

JOSEPH ROBERTSON.

(The Vestry, Clayton Church.)