In that dread moment how the frantic soul
Raves round the walls of her clay tenement,
Runs to each avenue and shrieks for help,
But shrieks in vain.

A New Verse Play

FOREWORD

Nothing—you will be thinking—remains sacred. Here he is intruding himself even upon these few simple moments before the curtain rises and we are asked to bear with him through the two and a half hours’ traffic of this evening’s stage. Believe me when I say that I should not have had the temerity to attempt this premature intrusion had I not felt that here was an opportunity to record, in the least transitory of forms, something of the gratitude that I feel towards those who have made this production possible, towards the committee of A.U.D.S., which showed great faith, and, I might I say, no little courage, in backing “Clay Tenement,” and towards a great many persons who individually have always been willing to advise, to counsel, and encourage.

I am only too conscious that all the good intentions in the world will have been to no avail if to-night we, the actors and myself, are unable to satiate your appetite for pleasure—to satisfy your desire—and, indeed, your right—to be pleased. Of the play itself, therefore, I shall say nothing, save that the action takes place within the space of one night in the crypt of a ruined church in a city which may be any city that is being ravaged by a civil war. The time is hard to define. What happens may have happened at some time in the past; the action may well have a significance in relation to that time in which we find ourselves at present; it is, however, more probably related to that time which is yet to come.
