None of the birthday honors will give greater pleasure to our youth than news of the survival of Sir Douglas Mawson. The isolation of the Antarctic has been a subject of great interest for many years, and the news of Mawson's survival is a great relief to all who have been following his progress. Mawson has been on the continent for several months, and has been subjected to great hardships. He has been severely wounded, and has had to endure great hardships in the cold and Katherine. He has been able to carry on his work successfully, and has made valuable contributions to our knowledge of the Antarctic, which is of great importance to the future of the southern hemisphere.
