Mr. Peake said it occurred to him that he could possibly be in a position in a university to help others to gain the same knowledge which he himself had obtained, that this would be a way of repaying a part of the debt he owed for his own training, and that it would be possible to do this by teaching and research.

Mr. Ryan—Rather to tack the university on to their scheme.

Continuing, Mr. Peake said it was a university a national question then they might get national support and combination of the larger towns throughout the country. They had mentioned the same thing, that the Government should make it a national question and that some measure be taken by what was described as a dundie, and in other parts of the Commonwealth there are things that would put the matter before the Cabinet, and it would resolve full consideration.
