More technical courses were required, and more attention should be given to post-graduation education. The State control was suggested as being the best and most logical method of control by independent boards of trustees. The conditions were such that a tentative statement of the length of course required for adequate secondary education should be insisted on. The salaries paid were considered low, and the principle of payment of teachers was in many cases existing at the moment was expected to remain. The teachers were in many cases expected to do professional consulting work, as some similar officers in American colleges were expected to. Teachers' salaries were not paid. It was necessary to do something to provide reasonable aids to the schools and teachers in the rural districts. The conditions of the higher technical courses should be changed in such a way that they would be made to provide reasonable aids for the rural districts.
