AMERICAN ENTERTAINERS

Another Thoughtful Speech.

MELBOURNE, July 16.

Prior to his departure for New Zealand to-day, Mr. James service was entertained as hostlumber by the Victorian Assembly. The guests included Mr. Bryce, Sir John Madden, Mr. Brandt (Speaker of the Legislative Assembly), Mr. Bryce on rising to respond, was received with enthusiasm. The Parliamentary life had been very interesting. It was with the greatest regret that he offered farewell to the men he had met and called one to some other work. There were no great central events, but the Parliament was one of the most difficult and yet most exciting times he had known. He had not decided exactly what to do. He was at the Bar for a few weeks, and knew the English people thought there were great moral duties in a lawyer's life, but there were no moral duties in the man who followed the rules of the profession. A lawyer was under the law, but he was also a man. It was a case that had not decided in Parliament. It was under the law, but he had not decided it. (Laughter.) He had not completed his sentence yet—(laughter)—and he had to say that there was no extraneous difficulty to decide which was the proper course. He could not decide. Sometimes there was the question of party to be decided—(laughter). The claims of public interest to be considered. He thought, on the whole, taking human nature as he found it, he could not decide which was the same pretty well out of the ordinary. It was impossible to decide, and he could not. (Laughter.) It was a high one, and he had no reason to think he was any better than his companions. In Australia the position for the past 11 years had been full of interest. The making of the Constitution, the task of endeavouring to draw lines between the State and Federal Governments. He was pleased to learn that the difficult had been accomplished. It was not difficult at all, and the establishment of a new Parliament had in no way lessened the interest. Australia had no real test of the State Legislatures. It would have to wait with the best men to serve in the Parliament so far affected the State Parliaments, to destroy the ambitions of the best men to serve in them, or to diminish the public interest in them. The Federal Constitution was to be revised, and the States should retain much of their original position and that, supported by the confidence and affection of the people, would work for the good of the State as a whole. It was a matter of great satisfaction to all that the work had been done. He had not had the result of depressing the vitality of the States, and the States had the benefit of the division of the Legislature. (Cheers.) He did not think there was any great need of distinction between the functions of the two bodies. He saw no reason to doubt the States their ability to retain their usefulness, as before. There was, however, a great dividing line between the States and the Federal Constitution. It was in Victoria Irrigation had been undertaken, and there had been an accumu-

AMERICAN ENTERTAINERS

Another Thoughtful Speech.

MELBOURNE, July 16.

Prior to his departure for New Zealand to-day, Mr. James service was entertained as hostlumber by the Victorian Assembly. The guests included Mr. Bryce, Sir John Madden, Mr. Brandt (Speaker of the Legislative Assembly), Mr. Bryce on rising to respond, was received with enthusiasm. The Parliamentary life had been very interesting. It was with the greatest regret that he offered farewell to the men he had met and called one to some other work. There were no great central events, but the Parliament was one of the most difficult and yet most exciting times he had known. He had not decided exactly what to do. He was at the Bar for a few weeks, and knew the English people thought there were great moral duties in a lawyer's life, but there were no moral duties in the man who followed the rules of the profession. A lawyer was under the law, but he had not decided it. (Laughter.) He had not completed his sentence yet—(laughter)—and he had to say that there was no extraneous difficulty to decide which was the proper course. He could not decide. Sometimes there was the question of party to be decided—(laughter). The claims of public interest to be considered. He thought, on the whole, taking human nature as he found it, he could not decide which was the same pretty well out of the ordinary. It was impossible to decide, and he could not. (Laughter.) It was a high one, and he had no reason to think he was any better than his companions. In Australia the position for the past 11 years had been full of interest. The making of the Constitution, the task of endeavouring to draw lines between the State and Federal Governments. He was pleased to learn that the difficult had been accomplished. It was not difficult at all, and the establishment of a new Parliament had in no way lessened the interest. Australia had no real test of the State Legislatures. It would have to wait with the best men to serve in the Parliament so far affected the State Parliaments, to destroy the ambitions of the best men to serve in them, or to diminish the public interest in them. The Federal Constitution was to be revised, and the States should retain much of their original position and that, supported by the confidence and affection of the people, would work for the good of the State as a whole. It was a matter of great satisfaction to all that the work had been done. He had not had the result of depressing the vitality of the States, and the States had the benefit of the division of the Legislature. (Cheers.) He did not think there was any great need of distinction between the functions of the two bodies. He saw no reason to doubt the States their ability to retain their usefulness, as before. There was, however, a great dividing line between the States and the Federal Constitution. It was in Victoria Irrigation had been undertaken, and there had been an accumu-