The examiner who corrected the arithmetic paper of the candidates at the last examination in connection with the Adelaide University, remarks that mental lack of commonness was displayed by some candidates who were obtaining by some slip answers palpably absurd, and setting them up without comment. The cost of living is the rule and the cost of living is the rule. If on some large scale, one candidate suggested that he had a Rs. 1,000, another wanted fifty million. More extraordinary still, many candidates reckoned in Question 6 the salary of a newspaper man should be able to save £5 a week or more out of his earnings, one suggested £2,500. A man further it was frequently desired that the man would work 168 hours a week at normal wages and twelve hours at overtime rates in addition. Surely common sense should suggest that such answers needed revision.
