On the Continent.

Sending of his Continental experiences, Mr. P. T. Short, arrived in London in the beginning of September, and his first move was to call upon Professor Xaver Scherwenka, to whom he has sent an interesting letter of introduction from Herr Reimann, a former pupil of Professor Scherwenka. Mr. Short, who is a pupil of the great master, has made much progress in his studies, and is now residing in Paris, where he is receiving a careful instruction from Prof. Leo Blech, Steinbach, and Schoindorf, the principal teachers of the day.

The visit of Professor Scherwenka in Paris was a great event, and the pupil was much gratified to meet the master, who has always been kind to him. He is now engaged in a study of the modern French music, and is making rapid progress in the field.

GRADUATES IN FORESTRY.

When Mr. H. H. Corbin, B.Sc., came from Edinburgh to join the Forest Department of Scotland, it is said that he was disappointed at the reception his knowledge and experience would receive. However, it was found desirable to establish a School of Forestry, attached to the University of Edinburgh, which has been maintained in the science of forestry, with a view to promoting the study of the subject. The school has now taken up the work of the tree culture. Equipped with this knowledge, there is an opening for those who have a genuine interest in the subject, and who are prepared to devote their time and energy to the study of the subject.

According to Mr. Corbin, the school is already making excellent progress, and the pupils are being well prepared for the practical work of forestry. The training is given in the science and practice of forestry, and the students are being taught the importance of the subject and the need for a thorough knowledge of the principles of forestry.

The graduates show a high standard of work, and are well prepared for the practical work of forestry. They have shown a marked interest in the subject and have been well prepared for the practical work of forestry.

A Life Sketch.

Almost literally till the hour of her death Lady Way was leading her ordinary life, giving her time and her thoughts and energies to the work of the institution she founded.

Her will was to fulfill the countless duties which her public and social position and her own wide sympathies brought her. No one could have been surprised or the less devoted, for many lives, and the sorrow of those who were privileged to work with her and to know her is saddened by the sadness of the knowledge that her life was so full of so many kind and generous deeds. There was hardly a charity or a committee in Adelaide with which she was not associated, and to her "association" meant not a mere mechanical attendance at committee meetings, but sincere and enthusiastic interest in the work that was for the benefit of others — and especially for the benefit of women and children — too small or insignificant for public notice.

In Adelaide she was intimately connected with the work of the Adelaide Children's Hospital, the State Children's Council, the Queen's Hospital forJuvenile Diseases, the District Training Nursing Home, the Home for Incurables, the Lady Victoria Buxton Girls' Club, and the Women's Christian Association. She was also a strong supporter of Ministering Children's League, the Young Women's Christian Association, and the Women's Aid Society, and her influence was strong.

She had been President of the Queen's Almshouses Corporation, and she had taken a personal interest in the affairs of the Victoria League to All Women, the golf and tennis clubs, and to each of them she gave generously of her time and her strength. After her marriage, she became active in the Chief Justice — which was celebrated on her 35th birthday in 1858 — she was called upon on four separate occasions to undertake the duties which fall to the lot of the wife of the Lieutenant-Governor, and each time endeavored herself afar to the Adelaide public at large, and to make her influence felt in her ready hospitality. It was only a few days ago that a friend spoke of her "humility" and "kindness," that said "she could not be too kind" and "generous, swift in her sympathies and her understanding, ready always with help and affection, and "kind to a fault." She had no time for pettiness, and the small things of life just passed her by. She was busy all day in her work, and came to South Australia in her in her work with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Gordon. Soon after her marriage, she joined the staff of the Women's Aid Society, and was an aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Gallan, and lived with them at Burdies, near Strathbogie, and that is where she spent her early years. She then left home, as she continued to live at the Blue's for many years, and it was only owing to their efforts that the Strathbogie section of the Blue's was more widely known. She was a great supporter of the Blue's, and her name was always associated with the Blue's. She was a great champion of the Blue's in every way, and was always ready to listen to tales of distress and trouble, and to see how matters could be.
