DEMOCRATISING THE UNIVERSITY.

Points by a Professor.

[By Professor Jethro Brown.]

So much has been said about making our University a more democratic institution that it means not only to diminish the space in your columns for the views of those who have had the organization of universities in mind for many years, deeply interested in the progress of the democratic movement, and who not infrequently find the government, the people, and for that matter the University, indifferent to the views of the students. The University is an institution in which the democratic spirit is very much alive, but the influences of the outside world cannot be altogether divorced from it. The University is not a mere collection of buildings, but a living organism, subject to the government of the University and the administration by the University, and as such, it is really a community in itself.

I. The Nature of the University.—The University is essentially an educational institution, and the education of the University is what we call the University. It is not, however, the only function of the University, for it is also a community, and as such, it has a social function. The University is a community of students, and as such, it is a community with all the functions which the University has. Its social function is, however, not to be undervalued, for it is through this function that it is able to influence the social life of the nation.

II. The University as a Community.—The University is a community of students, and as such, it has a social function. The University is a community of students, and as such, it has a social function. The University is a community of students, and as such, it has a social function. The University is a community of students, and as such, it has a social function.

III. The Adequate Equipment of the University.—A university which is to fulfil national purposes must be adequately equipped. It is the duty of the United Kingdom to ensure that every university is adequately equipped. This is a matter of national policy, and as such, it is a matter of national concern. The government must see that every university is adequately equipped with the necessary facilities for the discharge of its duties. This is a matter of national policy, and as such, it is a matter of national concern.

In the course of the discussion that has taken place, it has been shown that the success of the University depends on the adequacy of its equipment. The more modern the equipment, the more efficient the University will be. The success of the University depends on the adequacy of its equipment. The more modern the equipment, the more efficient the University will be.
