The movement, continued Mr. Ryan, "will not be, and should not be, a narrow sectional movement. It would be a movement to which would be given shape and substance and direction by the trade unions, in that it would be the practical expression of the trade union movement in the country.

The importance of the movement, in my view, is not so much in the doctrine of the trade union, but in the fact that it is the expression of the trade union movement. The movement is not a means to an end, but an end in itself. It is not a means to achieve a particular goal, but a goal in itself. It is a movement to which the trade unions should give their support and strength.

There is no doubt that the movement will be an important step forward in the development of the trade union movement in the country. It will be a movement that will be of great benefit to the working class, and it will be a movement that will have a great influence on the political and social life of the country.

Mr. Ryan concluded by saying that the movement would be a success if it was given the support and strength of the trade unions, and if it was given the opportunity to develop and grow. He said that the movement was not a means to an end, but an end in itself. It was a movement that was to be given support and strength by the trade unions, and it was a movement that was to be given the opportunity to develop and grow.
