MODERN EDUCATION

ADDRESS BY MR. BRYCE

The Right Hon. James Bryce, upon being presented with a honorary degree at the New Year says the "Daily Telegraph," has taken the occasion to draw attention to the Conference of Educational Associations at the University of London, and in his address has voiced the growing demand for adequate provision of educational opportunities. He has voiced the concern that although much has been done in secondary education, the gaps between different social groups and the disparities in education are still significant. He has urged for more comprehensive educational policies to ensure that education is not only a tool for personal development but also for social advancement.

The concept that teachers must keep up to date with the latest research in their field has been supported by leading educational institutions, such as the College of Preceptors, the College of Teachers, and the University of London. The conference has emphasized the importance of continuing professional development for teachers to ensure that they are equipped to meet the diverse needs of their students.

Thus, it is important to recognize the achievements in modern education, but also to identify areas for improvement. The government and educational institutions should work together to ensure that everyone, regardless of their background, has access to quality education. This will require a commitment to funding, resources, and collaboration across different sectors to address the challenges of modern education.

The Conference of Educational Associations at the University of London is an opportunity to discuss and address these issues. By bringing together educators, policymakers, and researchers, the conference aims to foster dialogue and innovation in the field of education. It is an encouraging sign of the commitment to improving education and ensuring that it remains a valuable tool for personal growth and societal progress.