BRITISH DEMOCRACY.

FINE ADDRESS BY PROFESSOR HENDERSON.

PROBLEMS OF THE PRESENT DAY.

Professor G. C. Henderson, who delivered the annual address at the University, has expressed the profound importance of a careful and searching study of the political and historical facts, which must be understood if the system of government to which we are subjected is to be safeguarded. He referred to the history of democracy as the foundation of modern government, and the need for continuous education and enlightenment.

The Duke of Newcastle, how one can move through the mazes of the electorate, how business and agriculture can be harmonized, and how the law should be administered, are all important considerations in the maintenance of a stable and prosperous society.

But it is not enough to study the past; we must also look to the future. What will be the nature of government in the years to come? Will it be based on tradition and custom, or will it be guided by the principles of democracy?

The Duke of Newcastle, how one can move through the mazes of the electorate, how business and agriculture can be harmonized, and how the law should be administered, are all important considerations in the maintenance of a stable and prosperous society.

But it is not enough to study the past; we must also look to the future. What will be the nature of government in the years to come? Will it be based on tradition and custom, or will it be guided by the principles of democracy?

The Duke of Newcastle, how one can move through the mazes of the electorate, how business and agriculture can be harmonized, and how the law should be administered, are all important considerations in the maintenance of a stable and prosperous society.

But it is not enough to study the past; we must also look to the future. What will be the nature of government in the years to come? Will it be based on tradition and custom, or will it be guided by the principles of democracy?