EDUCATION IN SOUTH AUSTRALIA

THE NEED FOR REFORMS

ADDRESS BY MR. ANGAS PARSONS

Matters of vital public interest relating to education reform in South Australia were discussed yesterday by Mr. Angas Parsons, M.E.A., in a paper read before the South Australian Education Commission, in which he pointed out that although South Australia was one of the leading colonics in the matter of primary education, there were many problems that were causing concern. He attributed these problems to the rapid growth of the State and the increasing demand for educational facilities. He suggested that a comprehensive educational plan should be formulated to meet the needs of the community. The plan should take into account the need for modern facilities, the provision of adequate funds, and the training of teachers. He also urged the establishment of a central control over education, which would ensure uniformity and quality of education across the State.

Mr. Parson's speech was followed by a spirited discussion, during which many points were raised, including the need for more funds, the allocation of resources, and the role of government in education. The meeting was adjourned until next week for further discussion.

The Need for Reforms

Address by Mr. Angas Parsons

Matters of vital public interest relating to education reform in South Australia were discussed yesterday by Mr. Angas Parsons, M.E.A., in a paper read before the South Australian Education Commission, in which he pointed out that although South Australia was one of the leading colonics in the matter of primary education, there were many problems that were causing concern. He attributed these problems to the rapid growth of the State and the increasing demand for educational facilities. He suggested that a comprehensive educational plan should be formulated to meet the needs of the community. The plan should take into account the need for modern facilities, the provision of adequate funds, and the training of teachers. He also urged the establishment of a central control over education, which would ensure uniformity and quality of education across the State.

Mr. Parson's speech was followed by a spirited discussion, during which many points were raised, including the need for more funds, the allocation of resources, and the role of government in education. The meeting was adjourned until next week for further discussion.

The Need for Reforms

Address by Mr. Angas Parsons

Matters of vital public interest relating to education reform in South Australia were discussed yesterday by Mr. Angas Parsons, M.E.A., in a paper read before the South Australian Education Commission, in which he pointed out that although South Australia was one of the leading colonics in the matter of primary education, there were many problems that were causing concern. He attributed these problems to the rapid growth of the State and the increasing demand for educational facilities. He suggested that a comprehensive educational plan should be formulated to meet the needs of the community. The plan should take into account the need for modern facilities, the provision of adequate funds, and the training of teachers. He also urged the establishment of a central control over education, which would ensure uniformity and quality of education across the State.

Mr. Parson's speech was followed by a spirited discussion, during which many points were raised, including the need for more funds, the allocation of resources, and the role of government in education. The meeting was adjourned until next week for further discussion.

The Need for Reforms

Address by Mr. Angas Parsons

Matters of vital public interest relating to education reform in South Australia were discussed yesterday by Mr. Angas Parsons, M.E.A., in a paper read before the South Australian Education Commission, in which he pointed out that although South Australia was one of the leading colonics in the matter of primary education, there were many problems that were causing concern. He attributed these problems to the rapid growth of the State and the increasing demand for educational facilities. He suggested that a comprehensive educational plan should be formulated to meet the needs of the community. The plan should take into account the need for modern facilities, the provision of adequate funds, and the training of teachers. He also urged the establishment of a central control over education, which would ensure uniformity and quality of education across the State.

Mr. Parson's speech was followed by a spirited discussion, during which many points were raised, including the need for more funds, the allocation of resources, and the role of government in education. The meeting was adjourned until next week for further discussion.