DISEASE AND MATERIALISM.

To the Editor.

Sir,—In Mr. Hackett's raise issue no one has tried to account for the mysterious powers of the sick man. I presume his arguments go no further than the mere fact that there are powers acting to keep his body alive, and I have no objection to this.

I have not heard with Lord Harrington. His famous name is usually applied to the man who certainly gave no support to the theory of the human spiritualist. He is also a man of a very practical turn of mind. It is a mistake to combat a subject so that some one else is more or less interested in the matter and motion. I quite agree with you that this is materialism, and that the two have not been confounded.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

After this Mr. Hackett dealt with both of the same subjects in a natural and logical manner, so that some one else is more or less interested in the matter and motion. I quite agree with you that this is materialism, and that the two have not been confounded.

The first article was a reply to the second, which was a reply to the first, and so on. The argument was well conducted, and the conclusion was left hanging in the air. The reader was left to decide whether the disease was material or spiritual.

This correspondence was published in the periodical "The Times," from 1921 to 1922.

The Importance of Anthropology

"Edward Stirling Chair" Suggested.

Speaking at a meeting of the University Graduates' Association at the Avon Theatre, Adelaide University, on Thursday, April 11th, Professor Wood-Jones urged on the importance of anthropology. He pointed out that it was necessary to have a chair in the subject, and suggested the Edward Stirling Chair. The students are very much interested in this suggestion, and the matter will be further canvassed in the future.

Aplay on Professor Wood-Jones and Edward Stirling.

As usual there was a large and interested audience at the meeting, and the evening was a great success. Professor Wood-Jones, who has been a student of the university for many years, is well known for his knowledge of anthropology, and his lectures are eagerly awaited.

The Professor concluded his lecture with the following words: "We have seen that anthropology is a subject which is of the utmost importance, and that it is necessary to have a chair in the subject. The Edward Stirling Chair is a suggestion which I make, and I hope that it will be taken up by the university authorities. The students are very much interested in this suggestion, and the matter will be further canvassed in the future.

The Professor then went on to explain the importance of anthropology, and the need for a chair in the subject. He pointed out that anthropology is a subject which is of the utmost importance, and that it is necessary to have a chair in the subject. The Edward Stirling Chair is a suggestion which I make, and I hope that it will be taken up by the university authorities. The students are very much interested in this suggestion, and the matter will be further canvassed in the future.
