The Director's Dream

He dreamt of the day when they would have vocational education to meet the needs of all those boys and girls. He knew that primary schools, with their multiplication of supervisors of education, would be one of the first to be affected. The Director thought of the problems that lay ahead, and how they could be overcome. He was determined to make the most of the opportunities available.

Increased Taxation

He was glad to see the Government had decided to increase the salaries of educationists. The number of employees over the age of 25 who were living in a single state was greatly increased. It was important to make sure that every child received a proper education. The school feeding program was also important. The health and well-being of children was vital to their future success. The Director believed that by increasing the salaries of teachers, more children would be able to afford a proper education.

Higher Education

The appointment of Mr. William James Adams as Principal of the Adelaide High School to the new office of Substantiation of Secondary Education, and Inspector of Higher Schools, was a great event. The Director was pleased with the appointment. He knew that Mr. Adams was a good choice for the job. He had experience in the field and was well respected. The Director was sure that Mr. Adams would do a good job.

The Director was also pleased to see that the government was investing in education. The establishment of new schools and the expansion of existing ones was a positive step forward. The Director believed that education was the key to a better future for all.

Advent of the Teacher

The advent of the teacher in South Australia had been a long time coming. The Director was glad to see that the government was finally taking education seriously. He knew that the country needed good teachers, and he believed that the government was finally recognizing the importance of education. The Director was sure that the government would continue to invest in education in the future.

The Director's Dream was coming true. He knew that the future of education in South Australia was bright. He was confident that the government would continue to invest in education, and that the country would continue to benefit from a well-educated populace.
