Mr. T. S. Smith asserted that the government's failure to convert the social system was due to the fact that the government was not doing enough. He recommended the government to pay more attention to the social system and to make it more efficient. He also suggested that the government should provide more funding for research and development in social sciences.

Mr. W. J. Smith agreed with Mr. T. S. Smith's ideas and added that the government should also focus on improving the education system. He suggested that the government should provide more resources for education and that the quality of education should be improved. He also recommended that the government should provide more funding for research and development in education.

Mr. J. H. Miller disagreed with the previous speakers and argued that the government's failure to convert the social system was due to the lack of political will. He suggested that the government should provide more incentives for political leaders to support the conversion of the social system. He also recommended that the government should provide more funding for research and development in political sciences.

Mr. H. L. Smith agreed with Mr. J. H. Miller's ideas and added that the government should also focus on improving the education system. He suggested that the government should provide more resources for education and that the quality of education should be improved. He also recommended that the government should provide more funding for research and development in education.

The debate continued with many speakers presenting their ideas and arguments. The audience was engaged and active, asking questions and participating in discussions. The debate ended with the moderators calling for the floor, and the next speaker to address the audience.
