SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON

SUDDEN DEATH ON THE QUEST

THE EXPEDITION CONTINUED

LONDON, January 29.

Sir Ernest Shackleton, the celebrated Antarctic explorer who died last week while on one of his farthest expeditions, was buried yesterday at the family funeral in England.

Sir Ernest died while the Quest was en route to the frozen South Pole. His body was brought to Gavrilovskaya Station, where it was to be sent to South Georgia by another ship.

Professor Gravil and other members of the party will continue the work of the expedition with the help of Shackleton's assistants.

SIR DOUGLAS MASON'S TRIBUTE

He was very much interested when I heard the news, remarked Sir Douglas Mason last night. The death of Sir

AN ADVENTUROUS CAREER

The sad news that has come from the Antarctic concerning the sudden death of Sir Ernest Shackleton, who was a brave and successful explorer, will be universally mourned.

The late Sir Ernest Shackleton.

Ernest Shackleton is all the more surprising, of course, in view of his magnificent record.

Mr. W. B. Burt, of the London Evening News, has been awarded the prestigious Brassey Medal for his contributions to Antarctic exploration.

Miss M. F. Proud, M.A., of Adelaide, who has been during some time studying under the guidance of Professor Adams, has been awarded the prestigious Brassey Medal for her contributions to Antarctic exploration.
