LATE DR. MELVILLE BIRKS.

A Useful Career.

The place of the healer has taken on a new role in the present society. The healing process is no longer limited to doctors and nurses, but is also the responsibility of the community as a whole. The role of the community is to maintain traditions and cultural practices, and to ensure that these are passed on to future generations.

An Appreciation.

One who was closely associated with the work of the deceased writer was his life at Heaton Hill, where he was a regular visitor. With regard to the first, there was a question of whether the high level of care which broke Hill now enjoyed was also true at the time of Mr. Birks. It was generally acknowledged, although slightly, that the hospital was not well run, with the result that care may not be as good today as it was in the past.

Mr. Birks was particularly interested in the work of the Medical Society, with special reference to the treatment of tuberculosis and other infectious diseases. His interest in the welfare of those affected by these conditions is reflected in his work as a member of the Tuberculosis Society of South Australia.

The candidates were nearly all young, and not much over their majority. Mr. H. T. Adams, a young woman, who had been on the legal staff of Mr. W. W. P. P. P., was among the several new members, who were introduced to the bench by the Chief Justice, Mr. W. T. Nightingale, and Mr. E. T. Cole, who opened the bench.

The new members were sworn in, and received their diplomas from the Chief Justice. Mr. T. H. Cole, who has been practising law for several years, was appointed to the position of Senior Counsel.

Tribute to a Worker.

This week marks the beginning of the Royal College of Surgeons under Professor G. T. Jones, who has served the College with distinction for many years. During his term of office, Professor Jones has been responsible for the introduction of many changes, both in the teaching and in the practice of surgery. His keynote to the College has been the importance of maintaining high standards of education and training for all medical practitioners.

August 20th is the day on which the Royal College of Surgeons convenes, and the College has a long tradition of excellence in the field of surgery. It is fitting that this day should be commemorated by a tribute to a worker who has done so much for the College and for the medical profession in general.
