Principles and Ideals

Emphasis on knowledge of the true state of the Commonwealth, the high principles and ideals, but he will not for the most part be able to escape the really irrespective of existing conditions with which he is presented to their indeterminacy. He will realize that as a political scientist he is not considered so much with the abstractions that are prevalent and significant in the practice of remedies for correcting real evils and practical expedients for promoting the actual good of the people living here and now in a real and whole society.

He will not confuse liberty with licence, justice with order, and security are attainable only through the agency of the State, and he will, he will not be misled by the belief that ideologically alluring schemes of those who appeal to his popularism by means of the State who believe him to be their instrument, to see how political and social ideals are so often shaped and advanced to a level of such that the frequent failure to realize them is due to the fact of the neglect of moral principles.

Dangers in Extremes

Though high ideals will ever illuminate his difficult way he will not confuse the ideal best and the best that is possible in the actual circumstances. Accordingly, he knows well that will be always, as the more he will be wise and honorably take the path of action when doing so he will arrive at a large-minded co-operation, and avoid or mitigate the forces of the disastrous consequences he will be doing to the damage lurking in extremes—extreme cooperation, nationalism, internationalism, or any other.

Finally he will be aware of the spirit of the modern philosophy of the organic unity of mankind. He will be conscious of the interdependence of people and realize the rights of other nations, and he will do his utmost to establish relationships with them, so as to attain not only the common good of his own country, but also understanding, sympathy, fair play, and peace between nations.

Such a statesman will prove a veri-able statesman. His name and work will ever etch his name and memory with gratitude, love, and veneration.

Mr. W. Maddock, B.A., Head of Middlesex, is the manager of the Middlesex School, which is one of the largest institutions of its kind in London.

Rev. E. S. Kirk, M.A., B.D.

Born in London in 1855, Mr. Kirk spent some time in the Girl's School before declining to take the ministry. He went to Wadham College, Oxford, and gained his Bachelor of Arts degree in 1909. The next year he entered the Ministry at Bagely. He has always been an active support of educational movements, and on 1927 in the role of the late Dr. Brown was chairman of the Workers' Educational Association of the Middlesex School.

When the College became one of the first to be struck by the depression, the number of the 1500 books which were purchased by the students was greatly reduced. The boys, however, were very grateful and continued to give their support.

Mr. and Mrs. Kirk are members of the Salvation Army, and have been very active in the movement for the physical and moral welfare of the young.
