THE ANGAS SCHOLARS.

Only Three in South Australia.

When the late Hon. J. M. Angus founded the Angas Engineering Scholarship in 1888, it did so to encourage the transference from the study of law and especially civil engineering, with a view to their settlement in South Australia. Out of the 98 men to which the scholarship has been awarded, only three are located in this State, the rest remaining spread over the countries of the world.

There is one recent feature. All the engineering jobs in the present day are not in the English-speaking countries. One, the late Sir Frederick Fairbairn, was one of the most famous of the scholars, being the chief electrical engineer for New Zealand. Shortly before his death, he was an Engineering Lecturer at the London Polytechnic. It was he who was selected as a Member of the Adeladie University Medical Board of the state's health.

IN CONCLUSION.

In a conversation on Wednesday morning, Professor of Chemical Engineering at the University of Adelaide, Professor C. P. Farr, when asked if he had any special advice for the students, said that in his experience, the most successful men were those who had made up their minds to do the thing they wanted to do and stuck to it. He said that the most important thing was to have a definite idea of what one wanted to do, and to do it with enthusiasm. He also said that it was important to keep up with the times, and to be adaptable to new ideas. The students were encouraged to take part in the debates and discussions that were held in the University, and to engage in scientific research.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

Detailed Remedial Scheme.

(Submitted by an article in the PRINCIPAL OF PARKIN COLLEGE, P.R. E. ROBERTS, PRESIDENT OF THE CHRISTIAN SEIOLOGICAL SOCIETY, on the views of the organization.)

Unemployment, in a sense, which lags the whole of the world, is not merely an economic problem. The prevalence of unemployment is a sign of social and moral decline. But we must understand that unemployment is a complex issue, and that there are many factors involved. We must not view it only as a problem of the poor, but also as a problem of the rich. We must recognize that it is not just a matter of individual failure, but rather a result of systemic and institutional failure.

In our society, there is a division between those who have and those who do not. This division is reflected in our educational system, where the rich are able to receive the best education and the poor are left behind. It is also reflected in our economic system, where the rich are able to access the best jobs and the poor are left with the worst. This is a cycle that must be broken.

We must adopt a comprehensive approach to unemployment, one that addresses both the economic and social aspects. We must work towards creating a society where everyone has the opportunity to work and contribute to the economy. We must also work towards creating a society where everyone has the opportunity to access education and training, so that they can improve their skills and increase their employability.

In our society, there is a tremendous amount of potential, but it is not being realized. We must work towards unlocking that potential, so that everyone can contribute to the economy and have a dignified life.

Permanent Unemployment Bill.

First of all, the Bill will establish the Unemployment Bill, of which it will be a part. This Bill will be a comprehensive piece of legislation that will address the root causes of unemployment, including the lack of jobs, the lack of training, and the lack of social safety nets. It will also address the issue of discrimination, which is a significant barrier to employment.

The Bill will provide for a national unemployment benefit, which will be paid to all unemployed workers. It will also provide for a national job creation program, which will create new jobs and opportunities for the unemployed. It will also provide for a national training program, which will provide the unemployed with the skills they need to find employment.

The Bill will also provide for a national social safety net, which will provide support to those who are unable to work. It will also provide for a national child care program, which will provide support to working parents.

The Bill will also provide for a national health care program, which will provide support to all citizens. It will also provide for a national education program, which will provide support to all students.

In summary, the Bill will be a comprehensive piece of legislation that will address the root causes of unemployment, including the lack of jobs, the lack of training, and the lack of social safety nets. It will also address the issue of discrimination, which is a significant barrier to employment.

We must work towards unlocking the potential of all citizens, so that everyone can contribute to the economy and have a dignified life. We must also work towards creating a society where everyone has the opportunity to work and contribute to the economy. We must also work towards creating a society where everyone has the opportunity to access education and training, so that they can improve their skills and increase their employability.
