FORESTRY EDUCATION

Plea for Adelaide School

The announcement by the Prime Minister, which appeared in The Register on Saturday, that the Commonwealth Government is to help establish a forestry school in the Federal Capital Territory, is a real surprise to many persons in South Australia, whose enthusiasm has been shown by a deputation which visited him when he was in Adelaide recently.

The school of forestry at the Adelaide University, with its famous Forestry Department, is one of its kind in the Commonwealth, but there is a great deal of South Australian opinion that the country would be better served if there was an independent forestry school in the State, under the control of the Government. The Prime Minister's announcement is in line with that belief, and it is hoped that the Adelaide University will not be left out in the cold.

The Prime Minister's announcement is a welcome step in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is hoped that the school will be well staffed and equipped, and that it will have an adequate number of students.

Co-operation Among States.

The Commonwealth Government has shown a great deal of interest in forestry education, and it is to be hoped that the States will co-operate with it in the work. The Adelaide University has already taken a leading role in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is to be hoped that it will continue to do so.

The Prime Minister's announcement is a welcome step in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is hoped that the school will be well staffed and equipped, and that it will have an adequate number of students.

The Prime Minister's announcement is a welcome step in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is hoped that the States will co-operate with it in the work. The Adelaide University has already taken a leading role in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is to be hoped that it will continue to do so.

The Prime Minister's announcement is a welcome step in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is hoped that the States will co-operate with it in the work. The Adelaide University has already taken a leading role in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is to be hoped that it will continue to do so.

The Prime Minister's announcement is a welcome step in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is hoped that the States will co-operate with it in the work. The Adelaide University has already taken a leading role in the development of forestry in Australia, and it is to be hoped that it will continue to do so.