THE FISHER LECTURE

The Guilds versus Modern Industrial Law.

Wide Gap Between Employers and Employees.

Present day industrial law, according to Sir Henry Brudenell, forced a wide gap between employers and employees at a time when the urgent need of the day was to bridge the chasm between the two. The old guild system learned to use the industrial laws to the grave detriment of the community. Disputes and grievances were often based not upon real grievances, but aimed at securing monopolies for political ends.

The Fisher lecture commerce, which was established many years ago as the result of an agreement between the University of Adelaide and The Sydney Morning Herald, was delivered at the annual meeting of the guilds by Sir Henry Brudenell, who is an economist and author on economics. The event was held at the University of Adelaide, and the speech was given to the guilds.

In his introduction Sir Brudenell said that the first time the Fisher lecture had been delivered was early in the 18th century. The first lecture was delivered in 1749, and it was not until 1778 that the guilds began to take a more active interest in the lectures.

The guilds were founded to protect the workers, but they soon became a source of conflict between the workers and the employers. The guilds were established to protect the rights of workers, but they soon became a source of conflict between the workers and the employers.

In his lecture Sir Brudenell argued that the old guild system was the best form of industrial law, and that modern industrial law was a failure.
