AUSTRALIAN FORESTRY

The Commonwealth is coping with a timber shortage that has not yet ended with a forestry policy worthy of the name. Its failure to equip itself with an adequate forestry service is due to the unhappy state of affairs disclosed in a report by Mr. Luke Poole on the timber industry of Australia. "The failure to initiate forest work in the past must redound to the discredit of the central authorities under the Commonwealth Forest Service. The measure of least that all, Forest laws are alienated; reforestation is conducted on a snail; not to say尤尤involving, results little is done in the way of education to keep the "forestry conscience" of the community alive. But the people are encouraged to settle and carry on primary industries only of, and within the margin of, State forests, which is a known that their interests will be more the destruction of the forests later on."

Again, the summer has only to be enough to make forest fires frightful and the timber industry is in a mess. Some say it is too late to replace the savannah timber with new growth. A great deal of timber may be saved in the future, but the miller is in a hurry, and even the Australian timber, which is so known that its interests will be more the destruction of the forests later on."
