There were nine new graduates in the professional and only live in the arts and science courses at the University of Adelaide.

University Commemoration.

This fact illustrates the remark made in our columns the other day to the effect that the pursuit of learning purely for its own sake is apt to be at a discount in a new and very progressive society like South Australia. In confessing the degree on two of the new medical men, however, the Chancellor was able to call attention to the fact of their having taken the arts course and then qualified themselves, in lines of general culture, before proceeding to the more purely professional portions of their studies. There are in all five normal graduates of our own University, while two were admitted on condition that they must complete a course at a distant university.
