is a contingency which should be guarded against, and the only effective way to do so is to proceed at once to take the useful steps to find a successor to Miss Porter. Whether this duty properly devolves upon Professor Flo or upon some one else we are not in a position to say, but whoever is responsible should lose no time in securing to South Australia the full advantage of the liberality of Sir Thomas Elder. There can be no lack of students capable of fulfilling the conditions essential to nomination to the scholarship, and the opportunity should be promptly afforded them of proving their qualification.

There is another matter affecting the arrangements of the Adelaide University which properly refers to the present time. The public are aware that, as the result of outside agitation and of the efforts of the governing bodies of the University, the Government has been prevailed upon to institute a number of scholarships for the benefit partly of day and partly of evening classes. The establishment, or rather the extension, of the latter necessarily entails additional work upon the Professors, and it is gratefully to their credit that they cheerfully undertook the extra duties without seeking for increased remuneration. It would appear, however, that the time-table which has been tentatively arranged does not give unixed satisfaction. The particular feature of it which is open to exception is that to which special attention was called in the letter of 'A Mother,' published in Wednesday's Register. It is proposed that some of the day classes for the first year of arts and science should be entirely merged in the night classes. This arrangement will be extremely inconvenient to certain girls students living some distance out of town who desire to enter. The drawback was not lost sight of by those who prepared the time-table, but they could not see their way to entirely avoid it without an increase in the teaching staff. To mitigate it as far as possible it has been suggested by them that certain classes should be held in the daytime and in the evening in alternate years. Obviously this does not overcome the difficulty, pointed out by 'A Mother,' and if a reasonably large number of students offer for both daytime and evening classes it is to be hoped that means will be found for maintaining both classes. It is, we believe, a novelty in University experience for certain classes to be relegated entirely to the evening, and although this may appear to be a sufficient reason for condemning the proposal if the usefulness of the institution will be thus definitely promoted without involving considerable increased expenditure, it is important that the interests of intending students who cannot attend at night should be as far as possible studied.

The examination for the Adelaide University scholarship of the value of £500, in the school of classics and comparative philology, was won by Mr. F. J. Poole, the son of Canon Poole of this city.

In nothing the utilisation of Adelaide University with that of Cambridge and the Universities of Germany stands out. It is bringing homes to the study of the Classics. The increase in the number of South Australian students going to the University of Cambridge has been marked, and a hope expressed that the new regulations which make it possible for one to enter the University at Cambridge may offer an increase in the number of South Australian students going to the University of Cambridge.

There may be some doubt as to the value of the Varsity scholarship, but it cannot be denied that it gives the student an opportunity to study the Classics in a way that is not available in the University of Adelaide. The student who wins the scholarship is sent to the University of Cambridge, and there he is given an opportunity to study the Classics in a way that is not available in any other Australian University. The student who wins the scholarship is given a chance to study the Classics in a way that is not available in any other Australian University.

The University Council have arranged to hold evening classes in French and German, and Mrs. A. J. Caldes, teaching the former, and Herr A. T. Reckner, of the University of Leipzig, the latter, will give a course of lectures in French on Wednesday afternoons on "Mobility," and Herr Reckner will give a similar course in German on Tuesday mornings, his subject being "A Revue of the German Literature of the Eighteenth Century in general and Lessing in particular in a different way."
