VOCATION AND CITIZENSHIP.

SOLUTION DEPENDS ON THE SCHOOLMASTER.

Professor Bonyard wound up the evening session in the uncustomed role of the student, when he asked a question somewhat on the line of, "Can you state clearly to us the characteristics of your father?" He also pointed out that previous teachers might have been too exacting in their requirements for vocations, though this was not their fault, for they had been taught the importance of education and the necessity of preparing a student for life. He then ended his speech by saying that, "A true vocation must be both practical and scientific, and the schoolmaster must always be aware of this fact."
