ON THE SURFACE.

The Rev. Principal Kirk, writing The Chronicle, says that, after considering the records of the affairs of the Old Country, it is evident that the English have a much more developed and comprehensive character than we do. They are more given to self-reliance and independence, and have a more decided sense of responsibility and moral obligation. They are also more given to hard work and perseverance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their families and their country. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-sacrifice and self-sufficiency, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-government and self-organization, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-help and self-reliance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others.

The Rev. Principal Kirk, writing The Chronicle, says that, after considering the records of the affairs of the Old Country, it is evident that the English have a much more developed and comprehensive character than we do. They are more given to self-reliance and independence, and have a more decided sense of responsibility and moral obligation. They are also more given to hard work and perseverance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their families and their country. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-sacrifice and self-sufficiency, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-government and self-organization, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-help and self-reliance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others.

Professor Osborn's Evidence.

According to Professor J. G. B. Osborn of the Adelaide University, the Old Country has a much more developed and comprehensive character than we do. They are more given to self-reliance and independence, and have a more decided sense of responsibility and moral obligation. They are also more given to hard work and perseverance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their families and their country. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-sacrifice and self-sufficiency, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-government and self-organization, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-help and self-reliance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others.

The Rev. Principal Kirk, writing The Chronicle, says that, after considering the records of the affairs of the Old Country, it is evident that the English have a much more developed and comprehensive character than we do. They are more given to self-reliance and independence, and have a more decided sense of responsibility and moral obligation. They are also more given to hard work and perseverance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their families and their country. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-sacrifice and self-sufficiency, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-government and self-organization, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-help and self-reliance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others.

The Rev. Principal Kirk, writing The Chronicle, says that, after considering the records of the affairs of the Old Country, it is evident that the English have a much more developed and comprehensive character than we do. They are more given to self-reliance and independence, and have a more decided sense of responsibility and moral obligation. They are also more given to hard work and perseverance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their families and their country. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-sacrifice and self-sufficiency, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-government and self-organization, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others. They are also more given to self-help and self-reliance, and are more willing to make sacrifices for the sake of their country and their fellow citizens. They are also more given to self-denial and self-control, and are more willing to put aside their personal desires for the sake of the welfare of others.