LENSOES LEARNED ABROAD.

THE TRAGEDY OF AN EXTINCT RACE.

THTS MEANING FOR SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

IV.-By Frederic Wood-Jones.

This year of grace 1906, marks an anniversary that will long live in the memory of those who have tasted the joy of knowing that the race was not yet extinct. This year is the centenary of the death of the last known representative of the Tasmanian race. It is a day of mourning and reflection for the Tasmanians, a day of sorrow for those who have lost their kin. It is the day when we recall the whole pitiful story. How the fight for existence is not an easy one, how the struggle for survival is a daily battle. It is the day when we realize that the Tasmanian race is no more. It is the day when we mourn the loss of a race that was once so great.

In 1906 the last member of the Tasmanian race was seen. The Tasmanian, a bear-like creature, was discovered by a party of hunters. The Tasmanian was a large animal, with a thick coat of fur, and a fierce and dangerous disposition. It was said to be the most intelligent of all the Tasmanian races, and it was the last member of the species to be seen.

In 1906, the Tasmanian race was declared extinct. The last Tasmanian was killed and its body was preserved as a museum specimen. The Tasmanian race was known to exist until 1906, but after that date, it was never seen again.

In 1906, the Tasmanian race was declared extinct. The last Tasmanian was killed and its body was preserved as a museum specimen. The Tasmanian race was known to exist until 1906, but after that date, it was never seen again.

In 1906, the Tasmanian race was declared extinct. The last Tasmanian was killed and its body was preserved as a museum specimen. The Tasmanian race was known to exist until 1906, but after that date, it was never seen again.