THE P(LOVER) PARADOX

A Fictocritical Poetics of Detection

Rosslyn Winifred Prosser

Thesis submitted for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the
Discipline of Gender, Work and Social Inquiry
University of Adelaide, Australia
December 2005
ABSTRACT

Incest
Memory
Story
Recollection
P(lover)

Fictocriticism

Echo is a poem

Queensland
Visible traces, suggested invisibility and woven writing

BEING

Photographic

the ordinary and the mundane

jokes,

Uncertainty

$T$ is for text.
IT STARTED WITH AN ANECDOTE ..............................................................................67
Memorial Drive ....................................................................................................71
Guilt Shame Fear ..............................................................................................76
Clue # 1 ............................................................................................................81
On innocence .....................................................................................................84
The Sky .............................................................................................................88
Mud Map ............................................................................................................90
Anecdotal Evidence ..........................................................................................94
Sub-textual Plot .................................................................................................98
Here lies: .........................................................................................................99
The Walk ........................................................................................................105
Story is to memory as memory is to story ....................................................108

POEMS OF MEMORY AND UNCERTAINTY ..............................................................110
Detective Fiction ...............................................................................................110
Horizon Madness ...........................................................................................113
Clue # 2 Lesbian Detective Biographical Details ...........................................114
Unspoken Knowledge .......................................................................................125
Love File ...........................................................................................................127
Sleepwalking ....................................................................................................130
Manifesto of Love ...........................................................................................132
Clue # 3 ...........................................................................................................136
Clue # 4 ...........................................................................................................141
Clue # 5 Resolution .........................................................................................144
Her house: the place of constructing identity ..............................................150
Song of the Shirt ..............................................................................................153
Canoe Tree .......................................................................................................154
Memory cannot be cloned ............................................................................155
If there is an echo in me ..................................................................................156
Skin Types .......................................................................................................158
Embroidery ......................................................................................................160
The archetype is made up ..............................................................................162
Engram 1................................................................. 163
She is a boat.......................................................... 166
On Memory............................................................. 168
Little fishes swimming past.................................... 171
Lifting the skin....................................................... 172
Records Office........................................................ 178
Postcard: Kangaroo Island......................................... 180
In the botanical gardens......................................... 184
You give me your memory....................................... 185
Collage as Method.................................................. 186
Echo Kiss............................................................... 188
It’s too late now for the manifesto of love.................... 190
Return..................................................................... 192
Travelling................................................................ 194
Mother makes gardens that become memorials............ 195
Engram 2................................................................. 196
I want to know....................................................... 197
Memorialising the thylacine..................................... 199
The story – almost extinct........................................ 200
Writing + Memory = Memory Writing......................... 202
INVENTORY OF CHILDHOOD...................................... 206
Object Lessons....................................................... 208
Vulcan Junior Sewing Machine Made in England.......... 209
Idle Hands.............................................................. 210
13 Piece Porcelain Toy Tea Set................................ 211
Small blue wooden piano with three legs and numbered keys 213
Ornament................................................................ 214
Dolls for Christmas Every Year.................................... 215
Greeting Card........................................................ 216
Child’s Cane Chair............................................... 217
Music Box............................................................ 218
Abstract

This thesis is a work of fictocriticism. The exegesis is both an alphabetical poem that works as an introduction and overview to the material, with further exegetical elements placed throughout the fictional, autobiographical and the poetic. It is not a factual or conventional historical or autobiographical account but rather takes up questions of the place of memory in the construction of subjectivity. It argues that the self is, in part, a product of discourse. The work is set in Queensland but ventures into parts of Australia to think about questions of travel and nomadology. It develops a notion of a domestic archive where the home is seen as a kind of museum of the self and family. The work is based around a mother and a daughter who is written as the persona of detective. One of the elements is the telling of an incest story. The mode of telling attempts to break from standard modes of writing in order to develop ideas of how memory structures lives and the ways in which the ordinary and the mundane become ways in which events can be read, as registers of pivotal moments. The work builds on ideas about place and landscape.

It works with anecdotes, stories and secrets in the construction of autobiography. It plays with the idea of a narrator through the use of poetry and fictocritical writing. In an attempt to disrupt the cohesion of dominant narrative modes the work moves between events and ideas, shifting perspectives are used as a way of achieving this. It uses the techniques of collage or montage in an effort to disrupt realist representation. In this way questions of subjectivity and history are put forward. These ficto-critical writing practices are made possible through recent developments in theory and practice. The work uses mixed genres producing a form of hybrid writing that interweaves poetry, prose and theory.