My dear Fisher,

This is blowing off steam, or rather getting rid on you of idle thoughts, when idle at Cambridge, and needs no answer. A remark you made led me to think over again the problem of the effect of family allowances on fertility. In my book I came to the conclusion that the effect naturally to be expected of allowances would be to increase fertility, and that this result would not be obviated by the mental effect on a minority of making them feel that better things are thus brought within their power. It is a problem in human nature, and I ought to say to myself "What do I know that makes me able to form an opinion on how human nature will work out under various conditions?" My answer must be "precious little". When I look around me I find that the few big families I know are mostly amongst the very well-to-do. A labour and a gardener I know, both self-respecting fairly contented men, who certainly are not actuated by the sentiment of hooliganism. I have often asked those who knew the slums well, or think they do, whether misery is a marked feature of the lives of slum dwellers, and have got the impression it is not. But I may be putting my thoughts into their minds, for I imagine that if the inhabitants were very miserable, a large number would cease to be slum dwellers. I have walked down the Mile End Road on a Saturday night, and misery is not the idea, very far from it, that comes into one's mind when looking into the face of persons by. We certainly must not judge by what we should feel in their circumstances; but if so what are we to judge by? The facts on the whole seem to me to fit in quite admirably. The belief that rising wages go with higher fertility; though that may be only a slowly pamphlet phase. I am more inquirers were possible. I should like, after the main causes being comparatively, then in seeing how they are distributed socially, and what impression they give in a visitor as regards mental attitude. With such a report one might make a better judgment. I wonder what did better would say on this point. I don't suppose it shall, even with a print again on this point, hence I like to let fly at you. Now will answer.

Yours sincerely,

L. Darwin
