Dear Fisher,

I want to empty an idea out of my head into yours. Our anonymous donor has the idea that he would like to subscribe to bike control checks. You know I am not hostile to them, yet for obvious reasons I want to water down his enthusiasm. I have just sent him a long letter, and in it I said that I should like to have an estimate made as to the number of children who have failed to appear (or had re-grown up, I Should have added in consequence of birth control. Would it be striking to show how much each clan would have been increased, as regards effective fertility in England in the last 30 years, assuming no fall during that period in the birth rate? Could such figures make fair as well as effective? The answer clearly is you see some practical useful possibility, including the idea as well as the what.

Yours,
