24th October, 1958.

My dear Todd,

I was indeed run in to talk for but a short while to the University of Oxford's Faculty of Medicine, who listened to me with patience, and, curiously enough, did not heckle and denounce me at the end of the meeting. They seemed to agree, on the whole, that the business of advising the patient for the good of his health should be left to the medical practitioner and not handed over to publicity agencies. Also, that when public money has been spent on research it is not proper for the research workers to withhold facts as obtained because they do not accord with the pre-conceived opinions. In fact my audience was a very sympathetic one, and probably predisposed to the unusual opinion that an understanding of genetics also is useful in medical research.

Have you heard anything from Belgium?

Sincerely yours,

G. F. Todd, Esq., O.B.E., M.A.