Dear Sir Gilbert,

It is most kind of you to send me a line of welcome to Cambridge. It all makes me look forward greatly to the opportunity of seeing so many of my old friends again. Besides this too, I hope I may have the opportunity of discussing with you the general problem which I foresee, namely of framing a policy for the University in respect of such a subject as Genetics. The position has some analogy with the comparable problem in respect of meteorology. This summer, however, I shall be chiefly concerned with immediate problems, such as where to put my mice.

Yours sincerely,
